Chinese Astrology Introduction

People in China have developed their own astrology which is based upon Ying-Yang and Five Elements namely: - Metal, Water, Wood, Fire and Earth, developed independently of the western tradition. Apart from these Chinese astrology also uses twelve signs, which are based upon a different zodiacal structure. Most people think that Chinese astrology as an over-simplified system of one personality type that applies to everyone in a given year. However, this astrology has a set of interpretative rules and divisions of topic in life equally complex as western or Indian astrology. The Chinese astrology is influenced by its cultural delineations that reflect the importance of family and ancestors.

The Origin

Chinese astrology origin is not exactly known but most of the methods may have developed in the time period equated with the Middle Ages in the West.

The Modern Version

Modern Chinese astrology focuses on the Four Pillars and the 5 elements, Earth, Fire, Water, Wood and Metal. Each person has characteristics of four animal signs as well as four elemental combinations. The year, month, day and hour signs present different aspects of the personality.

Nuances Of Chinese Astrology

According to Chinese astrology, the year of birth not only tells your age but also indicates a certain phase or aspect of sixty year circle of time. According to Chinese astrology, years start early in the calendar year on a new moon and relate to one of the twelve animals. Their qualities animate the year and color it with their distinct natures. People born in a particular animal year share certain common traits in the same manner as people born in common zodiac do.
